There are indications that the development of a new medium does not occur in a vacuum ① unrelated to the old media developments that have already taken place. It is tempting to accept the proposition that because they are "old," the old media have been developed by some point in time and do not change thereafter. Of course, this is ② untrue. Each of these old media is constantly ③ evolving over time. For example, party lines in telephony give way to private lines as technology continually evolves. And the fact that old media ④ stay over time leads to the proposition that the old media "interact" with the new media during the process of the new media's development to make the new medium something other than it might have been in the absence of the old media types. For example, Standage, a journalist and author from England, mentioned that the telegraph was a ⑤ precursor to the Internet in terms of its two-way wired communication.
